Debating Robertson's Case in Caucus.

Conkling's Attitude that of a Belligerent.

DISCUSSING THE SITUATION

WASHINGTON, May 10. It is expected in fact it is quite certain that the republican caucus will to-morrow decide that the Senate can not transact business until the nominations of Robertson and Merritt are disposed of. In this respect the public at large will regard the action of the caucus as the death of the opposition to the nominations. Notwithstanding the strength of the opposing forces and notwithstanding the probable result of the contest, the members of the Senate as well as republicans generally are anxious to have this all settled. Some democrats say they can not doubt whether the president will withdraw all of the unconfirmed New York nominations in order to get a complete reply as a personal matter on Senator Conkling, or whether he may even be induced to withdraw the Senate and proceed to dispose of them. Should the president withdraw all of the nominations, it is believed that he will promptly renominate Robertson and Merritt, and then the question will be squarely presented to the Senate whether it will confirm them. Should the president not

The Boston Transcript says: "Women in order of superior beauty." That is what it comes to when ballot and politics enter into it. The superior beauty have been found in the short counts as superior to all the claims of honesty.

The Denver Tribune says that the marshals of the United States marshal's office are unhappy over the question who shall go after the indicted Indians. After they are settled that question it would be well to decide who shall go after the United States marshals.

The Cincinnati Times-Star reminded Wendell Phillips, Theodore Tilton and Lucy Larcom in a very handsome manner to go nothing to cap the climax of scandal. They could not have done it more effectually if they had tried. Phillips is devoted to his success as a publisher of books and magazines, but it is by no means a common thing for public lecturers to thus remember their up-to-date shoulders. They have climbed to fortune.

The Detroit Free Press says: Mr. Gottschalk does not let his name cool for lack of keeping them in the air. Having rented of the government the mansion lately occupied by the postoffice and custom house now under construction at Philadelphia he leases the space for advertising purposes at the rate of $25,000 per annum. Paying only $5,000 per annum Mr. Gottschalk sees a handsome little difference. This is fully in keeping with the style and tone of business with the government.

The great Washington is full of latte savings of Conkling against the administration and against Garfield. The only wonder is that the newspapers have refrained from blaming the present contest by keeping these bitter sayings out of print. There is little doubt however that Conkling has gone too far to retract and will have to make his fight and accept his defeat as best he may.

The house in Grosvenor Street London in which Lord Beaconsfield died was soon to be had taken on favorable terms lease and fitted up for a very splendid mansion to give it some of position as one of those old and noble dowagers of all who were brilliant and distinguished in the London political and literary world. But he was never able to give one of those entertainments. He had occupied the house only three months when he died.

A new game at whist has been introduced with great success in some of the Boston clubs, and it might be played to the public advantage in the senate of the United States. The players are county of Dukes and gentlemen to assemble at a parlor and not speak or whisper to each other for a given length of time, an hour for instance—and it will be the hardest hour any of the party ever experienced. Violations of the rule are punished by subjecting the guilty ones to the direst things as penalties. Any punishment would not be very great infliction upon some senators but the long silence would be awful.

It is announced that the distinguished physician Dr. William A. Hammond has been giving views on the subject of cosmetics and other beautifiers. One of his lady patients became hopelessly insane and madly died from using a white lead dye she used. She was the wife of a governor of one of the western states. This is all very well and comes from an eminent physician must be true of course. Only it strikes us that it is not the wives of governors of western states that use white lead to their dye. The distinguished doctor was probably thinking of the wife of some western farmer or miner such as Shylock Colcrow.

The steamship of Grand Duke Nicholas on the Black Sea Express which he has always hated to leave has recently been fitted up. The Emperor Alexander and his family have taken passage in it and will have to make his fl
